Portland Family Preaching Fire Safety

by Joshua Anusewicz

“That will never happen to me.” How many times have you thought that before?

Todd and Mindy Aresco fully admit that’s exactly how they felt just over a year ago, before a tropical storm whipped through town and plunged Portland into darkness. Before they didn’t have enough flashlight batteries and instead used a candle for light. Before they fell asleep with the candle burning and were awoken by the sound of the smoke detector going off, the foot of their bed on fire.

“Nobody wants to believe it could happen to them,” said Todd from his new home, built on the same tract of land as the home his family lost. They like it, he admits, but it’s different, certainly much larger than any house he ever expected to live in. The floors and countertops are still immaculate and the walls are still pearly white, easily noticeable because of the fact that no pictures hang, mostly because they don’t exist.

The Aresco family lost almost everything they owned in that devastating fire last year, and now feel it’s their mission to make sure that nobody in their community – the community that picked them up at their lowest moment – would go through what they went through.

“We didn’t have a plan, because we never thought it would happen to us,” Mindy said. “Now that we’re back to normal, we want to give back.”

A year ago, it would have been hard for the Aresco family to imagine being back to normal. In the early morning hours of Aug. 30, 2011, shortly after Tropical Storm Irene, a candle in Todd and Mindy’s bedroom started a fire that set off the house’s smoke detectors. The candle was suspended from the ceiling, and Todd said he felt confident leaving it lit as they fell asleep, which they had done the night before without incident.

Seeing the foot of the bed on fire, Todd launched into action, carrying his wife out of the bedroom. “He went into survival mode and I just went right along with him,” Mindy recalls.

Looking to help, Mindy grabbed a fire extinguisher to try and suppress the blaze. One problem: the extinguisher had expired and was useless. The fire quickly spread.

Staring at the growing flames, Todd told his wife, “Grab a kid and let’s get out of here.” The two set off to grab their three children – Christina, now 11, Anthony, 3, and Todd, 2 – and scrambled out onto the front lawn. Todd rushed back into the home to get the family’s beloved pets, but it was too late: four dogs and two cats would perish in the fire. (One cat, a personable black cat named Jasper, survived.)

Fire departments from throughout the area dodged downed powerlines and trees to eventually get to the scene, where they found that

by Geeta Schrayter

The Hebron Board of Education last week officially began the process of replacing long-time Superintendent of Schools Ellie Cruz, who announced last month she would leave the school system in December for a new superintendent job in Plymouth.

Board members and residents also sang Cruz’s praises at the Sept. 13 Board of Education meeting, letting her know just how sorry they are to see her go.

The school board formally accepted Cruz’s resignation at last week’s meeting – its first meeting since the superintendent announced her departure plans. In her letter of resignation – which she read at the meeting – Cruz wrote she was grateful for the opportunity to work with the school district, and serving the community was “a distinct honor.” She said the work between herself and the board, staff, administration and students resulted in Hebron’s schools becoming “one of the most successful and highest performing districts statewide.”

“By working together, a good school district evolved into a great one,” Cruz read at the meeting.

Later, board member William Moorcroft said Cruz and the administration had “done wonders” with the district, and called her lead-

“You’ll be sorely missed,” he said.

Board member Stephanie Raymond wished Cruz well, but admitted she’d tried to convince her to stay “until I was blue in the face.”

Board of Education Chairwoman Kathy Shea was likewise appreciative. She said the district has made “tremendous strides” under Cruz’s direction, and was “very lucky” to have her.

During public comment, selectman Brian O’Connell thanked Cruz for what she’d done for the community, and said under her direction, “through some trying financial times,” the district has come out “top-notch.”

“Good luck with finding a replacement for those shoes,” he said to the board.

Parent Teacher Association Co-President Liz LaChappelle, who said “all anyone [in town] is talking about is Ellie,” and her departure, also expressed her gratitude and said as she fought back tears she was sorry her son was only in the first grade and wouldn’t have more time with Cruz.

Resident Carol Connolly was present as well with her 3-year-old son and a bouquet of flowers. Thanks to the superintendent’s hard work, she said, her son would be going to school fulltime at 3, 4 and 5 years old due to the implementation of full-day kindergarten.

“It’s a testament to our children and our community,” she said. “He’s so excited because of your hard work. There’s no one who can fill your shoes.”

But, still, those shoes will need to be filled, and Shea explained the district can’t be without a superintendent for a single day.

“The board must move forward to find a replacement” whether in the form of an acting, interim or permanent superintendent in time for Cruz’s final day on Dec. 15, she said. If an acting superintendent is the route the board wants to take, a waiver needs to be received from the Department of Education. The acting superintendent can be appointed for 90-day periods and needs to be at least working toward their superintendent of schools’ certification (also known as their 093 certification).

If an interim superintendent is chosen, Shea explained they need to have their 093 certification. An interim is usually hired for approximately $550-700 per day, she said, with the possibility for additional money to be negotiated for night and weekend meetings.

Shea added that efforts to search for a permanent replacement usually require the services of a firm that specializes in searching for and hiring school superintendents. Lebanon spent $14,000 through the Connecticut Association of Boards of Education to hire a superintendent in 2009-10, while Coventry used Cooperative Educational Services for a search in 2011-12 costing $15,000, shared Shea.

The money for the search and salary for an interim or acting superintendent would come from the money set aside for Cruz’s contract once she leaves the school system.

Shea added if the board decided to be their own search committee instead of utilizing a firm, it would require a lot of time and “lots of meetings.” In addition, “we don’t have the expertise the firms do,” she said.

Although the board went into executive session at the Sept. 13 meeting to discuss a potential candidate for the acting or interim superintendent position, Shea said this week no decision was reached, and the board decided to schedule a special meeting for Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 7 p.m., to continue the discussion.

“Right now everything is up in the air,” she said. “The plan is to continue the conversation that we were having [at the meeting]. I may have a better idea in the next week or so, but we’ve got to put all the options on the table.”

the nearby hydrant wasn't producing enough water to put out the fire due to the Metropolitan District Commission (MDC) cutting back on water pressure. By the time the fire was completely put out, the house was a total loss.

"[The firefighters] couldn't believe we were alive," Todd said of how quickly the fire consumed the house. The family was sent to the hospital for smoke inhalation and some singed hair, but all five of them made it out unscathed.

As the long road back to recovering what they had lost began, the community kicked into action. While going through the cumbersome process of assessing the damage with an insurance agent, the Arescos were taken in by their neighbors, the Gotta family, who owned a vacant home that they allowed the family to live in at a low cost. Donations soon flooded in from family, friends, local businesses, and complete strangers.

"Our kids had everything they needed in just a few days time," said Todd, touched by the generosity. Todd also pointed out the sad irony of another local family, the Meadors, who provided them with numerous baby-related items just days after the fire – and is now dealing with the loss of their own home on Breezy Corners Road due to a fire last month.

Last year's Family Fun Day, put on by the town's parks and recreation department, was also dedicated to the Arescos. This year's Family Fun Day, however, included the Arescos, who taught local families and children about the importance of fire safety and prevention. Mindy said with the "cause near and dear" to their family, they feel it's important to give back.

"Our goal right now is to get the word out there," she said.

At the Family Fun Day last Saturday, the Arescos gave out fire hats and coloring books donated by The Hartford, while Fire Chief Bob Shea and Fire Marshal Ray Sajdak gave children tours of the fire engines. The Middletown Fire Department also brought its fire simulation trailer, which showed kids what to do if a fire was happening.

Mindy, now a member of the National Fire Prevention Association (NFPA), said that just speaking with the children at the event showed how important it was for families to be educated on fire safety.

"Some of the kids had no idea what to do [in the case of a fire]," she said. "It broke my heart."

Todd added that many people showed concern for him and his family, asking how they were doing in the aftermath of the fire. He admitted it's hard to talk about, but didn't mind being recognized. "I don't care if we're recognized because of the fire, as long as it raises the awareness for others of what could happen," he said.

And the Arescos aren't just talking the talk, they're walking the walk. On top of Mindy joining the NFPA, she plans to join the Women's Auxiliary in hopes of organizing fundraisers and getting donations in support of the town's volunteer fire department. Todd also plans to join the fire department, a place where he already knows many of the brave men who tried to save his house that night.

"There's much more the community can do to help our firefighters because they're the ones that help us," Mindy said.

"Any little bit can help," Todd added. "You don't need to run into a burning building to help."

With all that the fire department and the community did for them, it's unnecessary to ask why the Arescos would work this hard to spread awareness of fire safety. When they look at the bare walls in their home or the empty yard where their pets once played, it's hard for them to forget what they've been through and what was done for them.

But it has also shown them the importance of having a fire plan, taking a minute to check if the fireplace is out or if the iron is unplugged, and keeping an up-to-date fire extinguisher. Todd said he certainly sees "life a lot differently now," but for the better.

"We've come back and we've rebuilt," he said. "We're lucky."

While Shea wouldn't comment as to who the potential candidate was that the board discussed last week, she added the board needed to "act quickly" to find an acting or interim superintendent, "then focus on what to do about a permanent superintendent.

Observations & Ruminations

by Mike Thompson

I got a letter this week blasting Rep. Chris Murphy for, among other things, being a career politician, and it got me to thinking. For the past few state and national elections – it doesn't seem to happen quite so much on the local level – incumbents have routinely been blasted for being "career politicians." Every election season, the rancor seems to get worse, to the point where it's basically a four-letter word to call a candidate a "career politician."

It's interesting, when you think about it. Most people would want to see a "career doctor," I'd imagine, or would want their children to be taught by a "career teacher." And don't you feel better taking your car to a "career mechanic"? Experience is generally looked upon favorably by others. But why is having somebody in office who's decided to devote his or her life to politics necessarily a bad thing? When did it come to be that the more experienced a politician is, the less desirable he or she is?

Oh, sure, I know the popular answer. The "career politicians" have been entrenched in the political system longer, have been corrupted by the Washington evil, and just need to go. But not everyone's corrupt just because they may have served in Washington for "x" number of years.

Nevertheless, "career politician" is now shorthand for saying somebody in office has to go. Republicans are particularly fans of employing the phrase (nevermind the fact that GOP vice presidential candidate Paul Ryan has been described as one by none other than his own brother), in attempt to convince people to throw the bums out.

But they're not all bums. For some, being a "career politician" simply means they're experienced, and won't require a learning curve following Inauguration Day. So next time a candidate blasts an opponent for being a "career politician," do some digging, look at that person's record. They may have devoted their life to politics, but they also may have done a lot of good along the way.

"Experienced" doesn't have to equal "bad." Don't let negative campaign ads convince you otherwise. Consider all the factors, and then vote.

Speaking of politics, I got an email at the paper this week blasting the Rivereast for its "juvenile political forum" and "obvious affiliation with Christianity." In the email – which was not a letter to the editor, which is why you won't see it here – the writer goes on to say they "will not be able to endure another conservative rant sent to you by some ignoramus who has nothing better to do with his or her time than to write hateful rhetoric about anyone who is non-white, non-Christian, or slightly supportive of women." The writer added that "publishing poorly-articulated letters about 'abortion clinics' and overtly racist rants cannot be considered

'news' – a point that I agree with, actually; that's why they appear in the letters to the editor section.

But as for the rest of it: do I agree with the "conservative rants"? Regular readers of this column won't be shocked to learn that, the vast majority of the time, I do not. But I can't simply refuse to publish letters I disagree with. Nor do I think the political letters are particularly juvenile. Does occasional name-calling take place? Sure. But none of it has been very offensive – "Distortion Joe" doesn't seem to mind – and I tend to find it interesting and, for the most part, in good fun. As an editor, you like signs that your paper is being read, and the regularity at which the letter-writers go back-and-forth with each other indicates it is being read. And like I said, the letter-writers seem to enjoy their rather spirited exchanges.

And as for that "obvious affiliation with Christianity" part, let me just clarify what I imagine most of you know: that's simply not true. I may be a Christian, but the newspaper itself is neither pro- nor anti-Christian. I've got a very good idea what drew this email-writer's ire, and that's a letter I published last week by an area resident who happens to be very much anti-abortion, has indicated as such in the past, and indicated it again last week. But her letter met the guidelines for publication and, as such, earned a right to be published. I'm sure some agreed with it, and others didn't.

Simply put, if I mixed the letters I disagreed with, I wouldn't be much of an editor. I think allowing the letters to the editor section to have a wide range of viewpoints – Republican and Democrat, pro-life and pro-choice, Coke and Pepsi – keeps it interesting. And frankly I think a lot of people agree.

Lastly, while it's political season, it's also the start of football season. And this year, that takes on extra meaning in East Hampton. The East Hampton Hawks Youth Football and Cheerleading Association is starting its inaugural season, and the folks there couldn't be happier. The four Hawks squads had their home openers last Sunday, Sept. 16, and, according to Frank D'Anna, president of the Hawks, "turnout was tremendous."

Some of you may recall a Rivereast story reporter Joshua Anusewicz wrote in February about the program starting up. East Hampton High and Vinal Tech had just joined forces the year before to start a co-op football team, and D'Anna and others were anxious to give other Belltown kids – specifically those age 7-14 – a local chance at the pigskin. So the Hawks were born.

And there's still time for kids to join the association, either to play some football or to do some cheerleading. Those interested should call D'Anna at 860-712-2888.

Kalinowski Sentenced to Three Years in Prison

by Joshua Anusewicz

Former Portland First Selectman Edward Kalinowski was sentenced Monday to three years in prison for attempting to solicit sex from a minor in 2011, a representative from Florida's Seventh Circuit Court confirmed this week.

According to Klare Ly, public information officer for the Seventh Circuit Court, Judge Margaret Hudson levied the sentence after Kalinowski pled no contest on May 23 to charges of using a computer to seduce or solicit a child, using a two-way communication device to facilitate a felony, and traveling to meet or lure a child for sex.

On top of the three-year prison sentence, Kalinowski also received 10 years of probation and will be designated as a sexual offender of the rest of his life, Ly stated. Kalinowski will also be required to go through a psychosexual evaluation and follow any recommended treatment upon his release from prison, she continued.

While in prison, Ly stated, Kalinowski will not be allowed to have Internet access or possess pornography, and will also be prohibited from having contact with any minors.

Kalinowski was brought to prison to begin his sentence on Tuesday, Ly stated.

Kalinowski, 60, now a resident of Ocala, Fla., was arrested Sept. 2, 2011, as part of a seven-day sting operation called "Operation Cyber Sting" that ultimately netted the Volusia County (Fla.) Sheriff's Office 15 individuals. According to the sheriff's office, Kalinowski traveled to a home in Daytona Beach, Fla. to have sex with someone he believed to be a teenage boy that he met online.

According to Sheriff Ben Johnson, all of the individuals that were arrested were found "lurking in e-commerce sites and social networks" and had made "overt declarations to undercover investigators of their intentions" to exploit children. The offenders had believed the children were between the ages of nine and 15.

A police report sent from Ly to the Rivereast shows excerpts of Kalinowski speaking – both over the computer and by phone – with an undercover detective, whom Kalinowski believed to be a 13-year-old male. The nature of the conversations is extremely graphic, describing numerous sexual acts Kalinowski hoped to engage in with the young male.

On Sept. 2, Kalinowski drove almost two hours to a Daytona Beach residence where he believed the 13-year-old male lived; he was promptly arrested at the scene.

Kalinowski served as Portland's first selectman from 1993-2003, and was a police officer in the town prior to being first selectman.

RHAM Superintendent Receives Raise, Contract Extension

by Geeta Schrayter

The RHAM Board of Education voted unanimously at its meeting Monday to extend Superintendent of Schools Bob Siminski's contract, and also give him a raise.

The decision came after the board met in executive session to discuss the matter.

The one-year contract extension – a move school board chairman Mike Turner called “standard practice” – brings Siminski to June 2015. The superintendent also received a 1.88 percent salary increase, moving from $154,100 to $157,000 per year.

However, the renewed contract calls for Siminski's health insurance premium to increase from 20 percent to 25 percent over the next three years, and his compensation for unused vacation days was reduced from seven days to five.

“We're limiting how many days he can carry over” to the next year, explained Turner, but he added the contract changes were really “nothing big.”

“He's been doing a good job for us,” Turner said. “People appreciate that.”

Turner added that Siminski has worked hard over the year to keep the district moving forward “with changing education requirements and managing finances.”

Also, Turner said, under Siminski's direction, the district had a budget surplus at the end of the 2011-12 year “due to favorable circumstances with special education tuitions and managing other expenses.”

That budget surplus was discussed earlier in the meeting. Due to credits in teacher's salaries, health insurance and special education tuitions, there is a $366,885.71 surplus. Some of the larger credits include $76,289.58 in curriculum writing; $51,044 in magnet school tuitions; $44,988.24 from curriculum supplies; $30,568.05 in Board of Education services; and $25,236.05 in lease/purchases.

The board voted unanimously to return the $366,885.71 surplus back to the towns in Region Eight.

Educational reform and its impact on RHAM were also discussed at the Sept. 14 meeting. In a presentation, Siminski explained various shifts that would occur as a result of the reform.

Under the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) legislation, the target score for students on standardized tests has been “proficient.” But with Connecticut's new reform, on average, the target is now for students to be “at goal” – and for districts to be halfway to that target by 2018.

In addition, starting with the current school year, the progress of students moving between all levels will now be counted, whereas up until now only progress made from “basic” scores to “proficient” have been captured.

Whenever a student moves from one level to another, Siminski explained, the school will receive a School Performance Index (SPI) credit, as opposed to only receiving a credit when students moved to the “proficient” level. The SPI is an index between 0 and 100 used to show school performance and progress as well as “big picture” trends and provide the ability to examine subgroups, scores by subject and grade level. The eight-year goal is for a school to obtain an SPI of 88 or higher.

“We want to look at all kids and the progress they're making,” said Siminski.

According to a six-year average of high school Connecticut Academic Performance Test scores, 24 percent of RHAM students score “proficient” in math, while 4.8 percent score at the “basic” level and 2 percent score below basic. The 35.7 percent who already score at “goal” and the 27.9 percent who already score at the “advanced” level satisfy the state goal, but efforts will need to be made to increase scores for the students in the remaining three categories.

Siminski said the students who score at the “proficient” level are those the school will need to work with the most.

In addition to standardized test scores, graduation rates will also be used to determine school performance. After 2018, the state target is for schools to have a four-year graduation rate of 94 percent and an extended graduation rate (students who stay at the school more than four years) of 96 percent. At RHAM, the graduation rate for the four-year cohort in 2010-11 was 84.6 percent, while the extended graduation rate was 92.5 percent.

Dependent on how many of the state targets a particular school meets, they will then be classified as an excelling, progressing, transition, review or turnaround school.

An “excelling” school is one that meets all state targets, while a “progressing” school is meeting the annual targets and a “transition” school is not. Conversely, a “review” or “transition” school needs the most support, interventions and possibly redesign.

“Our goal obviously is to get to ‘excelling,’ and we will get there,” said Siminski.

Teacher evaluations, which Siminski stated “will greatly influence what we do and how we do it,” were discussed as well. Siminski explained the goal is to implement the evaluations this year to “give everyone a heads up” on the new system so they'll be able “to understand and benefit from it.”

Under the new evaluation, teachers in their first and second year will need to take part in a number of goal conferences, formal pre-observation conferences, formal and informal observations, formal post-observation conferences and an observation summary. Tenured teachers will require one less pre-observation conference and two fewer observations than non-tenured teachers, but one more informal observation.

Administrators (principals and assistant principals) will also be required to take part in goal conferences, observations, a mid-year review, a self-reflection and a summative evaluation and end of year conference. Each aspect is approximated to take no less than 30 minutes, stressing the length of time the new evaluations will require.

In addition to the above, during the current 2012-13 school year, the implementation of the Safe School Climate Plan and Student Success Plan will take place, and the curriculum will continue to be updated to address the Common Core State Standards.

The changes and new initiatives highlight why the state Department of Education is calling 2012 “the year for education reform in Connecticut.”

Portland Blight Ordinance Running Smoothly So Far

by Joshua Anusewicz

The Board of Selectmen was given a welcome update Wednesday night, learning that the town's new blight ordinance was off and running and already improving some of the town's most blighted properties.

Building official Lincoln White was on hand to update the selectmen, who voted this summer to enact the blight ordinance and its corresponding citation hearing ordinance. The blight ordinance is a reworking of similar ones from Bristol and Windsor Locks, adjusted to target the specific needs of a town Portland's size. A subcommittee of First Selectwoman Susan Bransfield and selectmen Fred Knous and Ryan Curley drafted the document, which earned unanimous support from the board after weeks of tinkering with the language.

White said that some of the town's most prominent blighted properties have already been targeted by the ordinance and have mostly adhered to the town's regulations. As many who drive in the town's downtown area have noticed, the abandoned gas station property next to Portland Restaurant, an eyesore to many residents for years, has been cleaned up and repainted as the owners decide the fate of the property, White said.

Another abandoned structure, Forlini's, located directly across the street, has also been dealt with by the blight ordinance. Just recently, the owners of the building demolished the structure, a welcomed sight for the selectmen.

“It was a nice surprise,” said Curley. He added to White, “I think you're doing an awesome job and it's nice to see the progress.”

White also mentioned to the council that he recently walked the Elmcrest site with the property owners, referring to the land as “a total mess.” White said he plans to sit down soon with the property owners to discuss the future of the land, which the down has hoped to develop into commercial and residential property.

Bransfield said she has kept in close contact with potential developers of the property, who told her that, while some smaller businesses have been lined up, they need to secure an anchor tenant before they can begin construction on the plaza. Bransfield added that the developer is working with the town's economic development coordinator Mary Dickerson to attract more businesses to the shopping center.

As for residential properties that have been considered blight, White said he has spoken with several property owners throughout town about possible violations, adding that the property owners are either working toward fixing the problem or have already done so.

“Everyone has been cooperative so far,” he said.

* * *

Continuing on the matter of keeping properties clean, a resident stepped up during the public comment section of the meeting to urge the selectmen to do something about yellow bags that are thrown on the lawn of many residences throughout town.

The resident, Mary Pare, presented the selectmen with a box of yellow bags she had collected, which are used to deliver circulars from The Hartford Courant to residents around town. Pare said they are simply thrown on residents' lawns and should be considered littering, as they often get wet along the sidewalks and roads and are hard to remove.

“This is annoying,” Pare said. “If I threw something out my car on Main Street, I'd be fined for littering. This just turns into garbage.”

Bransfield said she had received several complaints about the bags recently and had talked to the police department about the possible enforcement of throwing the bags on private property. She added that other towns may have ordinances in place that prohibit such items from being thrown on residents' property, which the selectmen could possibly look into.

In the meantime, the selectmen voted to allow Bransfield to contact the publisher of The Hartford Courant to see if the newspaper would place the bags on the residents' doorsteps or hang them from the mailboxes.

The next regular meeting of the Board of Selectmen is scheduled for Wednesday, Oct. 3, at 7:30 p.m. at the Portland Public Library, 20 Freestone Ave.

Hebron School Board OKs Raises for Non-Certified Staff

by Geeta Schrayter

At its meeting last Thursday, Sept. 13, the Board of Education approved a new contract and pay increases for non-certified staff and non-union employees.

Board of Education Chair Kathy Shea said the negotiation process was “lengthy,” with “lots and lots of conversation” around the contract, which was ratified by the non-certified union Aug. 22.

“There was a successful result of the mediation,” she said.

Under the three-year contract, non-certified staff, which includes the district's secretaries, custodians and paraprofessionals, will receive a 2.25 percent salary increase in the current year, a 2.25 percent increase for 2013-14 and a 2.5 percent increase for 2014-15; Superintendent of Schools Ellie Cruz said Thursday. Cruz added the non-certified staff was coming off of a three-year contract with a 9 percent increase over the three years.

On Thursday, Finance Director William Mazzara explained what those increases translate into salary-wise varies depending upon the length of employment.

“We have different pay levels based on years of service,” he said.

When added up, the salaries under the new contract actually amount to $8,367 less than the amount budgeted for the 2012-13 year, explained Mazzara.

“I thought that was a very fair agreement all around,” said Cruz. “The board really demonstrated how much they valued these folks and wanted to give them a fair wage increase.”

Cruz added “some progress” was made regarding insurance as well. In year one, co-pays will increase from $15 to $20, followed by a further increase to $25 in 2013-14. The cost of emergency room visits increase from $50 to $75 over the next three years as well.

Premiums for full-time employees increase to 17.5 percent in the current year, then 18 percent in 2013-14 and 19 percent the following year. Part-time employees currently pay 23 percent and Cruz said the feeling was “that was a fairly generous contribution,” so it will remain steady until 2014-15, when it will increase to 24 percent.

“I think it's a great outcome,” Board of Education member Will Moorcroft said at the meeting. “I know it's a lot of hard work and I thank you for your efforts.”

The motion to ratify the non-certified contract negotiations passed unanimously.

Afterwards, salaries for non-union employees which includes school nurses, foremen and technology specialists, were established as well. Cruz explained at the meeting she usually waits until the non-certified contract has been ratified because she tries to mirror the non-union employees' salaries with the non-certified contract increases.

“So what we usually do is ask the board permission to award a salary commensurate to what the non-union folks receive,” she said.

The motion to award a salary increase of 2.25 percent to non-union employees passed unanimously.

There are about 66 non-certified staff and non-union employees in the Hebron school district, Cruz said.

Candidates Talk Issues as Campaign Trail Heats Up

by Joshua Anusewicz

Late summer has been filled with campaign signs and door knocking for both Christopher Goff and Melissa Ziobron, candidates for state representative for the 34th District, as they prepare for the upcoming Nov. 6 election. But unless you've had the opportunity to speak with them directly or visit their websites, you may not know where each candidate stands on important state issues.

However, the Rivereast had the chance to sit down with both Goff and Ziobron in recent weeks and see what they have planned if they are elected.

Goff, a Democrat, and Ziobron, the Republican candidate, will square off for the soon-to-be-vacant representative seat, currently filled by East Hampton Democrat Gail Hamm. The 34th District, which was recently restructured, includes East Hampton, East Haddam and the Westchester section of Colchester.

Goff, an East Hampton native, is best known for serving four terms on the Town Council and three years on the Board of Education. He elected not to run for council again in 2011, instead focusing his efforts on the state seat, for which he ran unopposed and received unanimous support from all three towns' Democratic committees.

Ziobron, who grew up in East Hampton but resides in East Haddam, is East Haddam's former economic development coordinator and also served for six years on the town's Board of Education. She narrowly defeated former East Hampton town councilor Bill Devine for the Republican nomination by a 6-5 vote; Devine declined a primary.

The two candidates say they are familiar with each other, having both grown up in East Hampton. They both have school-aged children, as well – Ziobron with two, Goff with three. But where they stand on political issues provides the voting public with two very different candidates for the position.

When asked about the state's budget, Ziobron zeroed in on the state's deficit, a number she doesn't need to look up: $434 million. But when talking about how the budget could be fixed, she said it would take more thought.

"We need to look at the whole budget, line by line," she said. "I want to understand what each item means and what it does before saying what needs to be cut." Ziobron said she was most interested in looking at the "personal services" line items for the governor and secretary of state, as well as watching the state bond commission, which she said often allows "pork barrel spending" and "pet projects" for politicians. She also looked at the recent trips by Gov. Dannel Malloy to China as an example of wasteful spending that has little benefit to the state.

Goff said what the state needs to do in an effort to balance the budget is "clean up unnecessary programs" and provide more oversight to various social programs. One program that Goff said needs oversight is the state's welfare program, where he feels that too often people are abusing the system and need to be reigned in.

"I believe that people who receive welfare should be drug tested," Goff said. "We need to support the program, but who does it benefit if these people are spending it on unnecessary things like drugs?"

Goff also said he would look into the regionalization of services to reduce costs, an idea he championed locally with the regionalized animal control officer. (East Hampton and East Haddam teamed up last year for a shared dog pound and animal control officer.) He said the district should look into regionalizing other services, such as the transfer station and public works department, to save costs for several towns.

Each candidate also focused on the importance of job creation, as well. As a former economic development coordinator, Ziobron said she has the experience to draw in new small businesses, helping write the town tax incentive for businesses in East Haddam. Her focus, however, is on helping existing businesses before trying to found new ones.

"We need to focus on the companies we already have here," she said. "It's a lot easier than luring businesses to the area."

Ziobron added that the state legislature needs to oversee incentive programs for businesses, such as Gov. Malloy's "First Five" program, to see "what the return is" on that investment.

"We have these companies like Jackson Labs, who doesn't create anything – no jobs – and are getting cuts," she said. "What are we doing to help these local companies like a Bevin Bell? Where's the state for them?"

Goff said that to create jobs, the support of small businesses will be crucial. He referenced the state's "set aside" program, which gives small local businesses a fighting chance to bid for state contracts against local companies that usually get the choice projects, as a program that needs more support.

"We're not just creating more jobs, but more long-term jobs," he said. "Plus, we're ensuring that Connecticut companies are getting the jobs."

Goff also hinted at the best way to create jobs at a local level: a town water system. He said that by creating a water system, which would shadow the existing sewer system, East Hampton would be able to attract businesses around Lake Pocotopaug and into the Village Center, an area the town hopes to develop into a destination for visitors. With the water system, East Hampton could turn into a Field of Dreams, so to speak.

"If you build it, they will come," Goff said. As both candidates have children within their respective town's school systems, education is a topic close to both of their hearts. Ziobron said she supported some of Gov. Malloy's recent education reform bill, agreeing that teachers should be held more accountable for the success of their students. She added, however, that the legislature should look into the need for multiple administrators in small school districts and how much money they are making.

Ziobron also said she was concerned about the sudden shift of support to magnet schools and the rise in unfunded mandates for local school districts, both of which put smaller school districts like those in the 34th District at a distinct disadvantage. She also showed concern for the funding cut to vocational schools, which she said put students on the path to formidable careers.

Goff agreed with Ziobron's sentiments that teachers should be held more accountable, not just for students' standardized test scores but for their overall performance, including in extracurricular activities. Goff said that although education budgets are difficult to formulate for local school boards, he is firmly against cutting extracurricular activities, as well as sports, music and arts programs.

"If I didn't have those extra activities, I probably wouldn't have gone to college," Goff admitted in supporting those programs. He also said that he would like to see local preschool programs expanded, giving more young children the opportunity to attend school at an earlier age.

On the campaign trail, each candidate has picked up on other issues that are important to the voting public. Ziobron said she has had support from voters in both political parties, a fact she said is due to her tendency to be "flexible" and have "an independent voice."

"I'm not so partisan that I don't see issues from both sides of the aisle," Ziobron said.

Ziobron touted as an example of her candidacy the importance she puts on the environment, a topic some might not necessarily think of as a priority for a Republican. Ziobron called the 34th District "possibly the state's most unique district," with numerous state parks and forests, rivers, lakes, and farms, all of which she said promote recreation for residents and are a tourism draw for out-of-towners.

"There are so many interesting spots that we have to enjoy and need to preserve," Ziobron said of the district.

Goff has also heard concerns from residents of the district, including concerns about his candidacy itself. Goff is a former state employee with the state Department of Child and Family Services, as well as working with patients that have mental health issues. In 2008, Goff was seriously injured in an incident with a patient, an injury that left him with a permanent back impairment and forced him to retire.

The issue that arose was whether or not Goff could run if he was receiving a pension from the state and, if elected, a salary as state representative. Goff said that he has consulted the state election commission and legal counsel, where he was given the approval to run for the seat.

Other than that concern, Goff said the response he has received from residents has been "positive and supportive."

Both candidates hope to continue to garner support and positive feedback from voters as the campaigns continue over the next month.
